Patented Rights!

The English legal system became the foundation for patent law in countries with a common law heritage, including the United States, New Zealand and Australia. In the Thirteen Colonies, inventors could obtain patents through petition to a given colony's legislature. In 1641, Samuel Winslow was granted the first patent in North America by the Massachusetts General Court for a new process for making salt. US Patent law as we know it today was established on April 10, 1790.

Inventions could now be protected against piracy. Nobody has a patent on honesty, but a property right to the results of human inventiveness and ingenuity is one of the things that has helped the US become the economic powerhouse that it is today. A patent or an invention is a solution to a specific technological problem and is a product or a process. A patent does not give a right to make or use or sell an invention. Rather, a patent provides, from a legal standpoint, the right to exclude others from making, using, selling, offering for sale, or importing the patented invention for the term of the patent, which is usually 20 years from the filing date. A patent is a limited property right the government gives inventors in exchange for their agreement to share details of their inventions with the public. Like any other property right, it may be sold, licensed, mortgaged, assigned or transferred, given away, or simply abandoned.

The problems with a patent are that when they are published you have given the competition the details so they can now figure out how to get around the patent. For example, the 1796 patent taken out by James Watt for his steam engine, established the principles that patents could be issued for improvements of an already existing machine and that ideas or principles without specific practical application could also legally be patented. The granting of patents began to be viewed as a form of intellectual property right, rather than simply the obtaining of an economic privilege.

LINK Business is like that 1796 steam engine patent, we are continually improving on how business brokerages operate. If you are a Buyer or Seller, try us and you too will find that we are the best because we keep improving.
